

Early Journal Content on JSTOR, Free to Anyone in the World

This article is one of nearly 500,000 scholarly works digitized and made freely available to everyone in the world by JSTOR.

Known as the Early Journal Content, this set of works include research articles, news, letters, and other writings published in more than 200 of the oldest leading academic journals. The works date from the mid-seventeenth to the early twentieth centuries.

We encourage people to read and share the Early Journal Content openly and to tell others that this resource exists. People may post this content online or redistribute in any way for non-commercial purposes.

Read more about Early Journal Content at <http://about.jstor.org/participate-jstor/individuals/early-journal-content>.

JSTOR is a digital library of academic journals, books, and primary source objects. JSTOR helps people discover, use, and build upon a wide range of content through a powerful research and teaching platform, and preserves this content for future generations. JSTOR is part of ITHAKA, a not-for-profit organization that also includes Ithaka S+R and Portico. For more information about JSTOR, please contact support@jstor.org.

covet it at such a figure, and it was withdrawn. It is certainly a gem. It is almost square in shape, being thirteen inches by ten and a half inches and about thirty inches high. The upper part is like a box, about nine inches deep, formed of five Sèvres plaques, with turquoise "œil de perdrix" borders, and painted in the centres with groups of flowers. The woodwork is plain and very good, and the metal-mounting and ornament excellent, the lower part of the legs connected and strengthened by a stretcher. It is said that some one, years ago, offered £4000 for the table at private sale.

HAUNTS OF COLLECTORS.

ALL collectors gravitate to the shores of the Mediterranean, and yet even there, remarks The Saturday Review, it is best to choose one subject and cleave to it. There are large shops in Naples, and larger shops in Rome, where money may be judiciously spent. The lace collector finds Valletta better than Palermo. He who loves "gold grounds" hunts in the country of Cadore. The amateur of Greek coins finds them at Corfu. A street stall in Alexandria will furnish him with Egyptian antiquities enough for an ordinary museum. The laws of supply are somewhat arbitrary. The places where you expect most are often drawn blank. The much-vaunted bazaars of Cairo seldom furnish anything worthy of the collector's attention. There is nothing to be had at Genoa and very little at Venice. Athens abounds in forgeries, and at Constantinople the collector only sees the best things in private. At Florence there are shops and occasionally auctions; and on the whole, any one who understands art, and cares for it, will find there an excellent field for his operations. Paris is of course better, but in Florence there is more chance of good bargains. To any one who knew it twenty years ago or more it seemed as if the quantity of precious objects annually carried away by the northern barbarians must soon exhaust the stock and cause the closing of the shops. Yet they are twice or thrice as numerous as they were in 1860, and their contents would be interesting if only regarded as a gauge of the changes of fashion in art-work and the curious vagaries of collectors. Majolica, Venetian glass, wrought iron, steel incrustated with silver in delicate relief, embossed leather formed into such objects as powder-horns and even into pictures, repoussé silver, mediæval medals, ivories, old engravings, old wood-cuts, enamels, parcel-gilt wood carvings, tapestries, fine lace from church vestments—such are a few of the principal objects sought after, and so rapidly have prices increased that previously unheard-of collections are brought to light year after year, and no bounds seem to be set to the supply.

The days, it is true, are past when a majolica plate or a reliquary of old Venetian glass could be bought for two or three hundred francs. When such plates do turn up now they fetch hundreds of pounds, and as for old Venetian glass, it has literally disappeared. The last craze is for rich brocades, small pieces of which, quite useless for any purpose except to make a banner-screen, sometimes sell for several English pounds. These things are very effective in the decoration of the shops, as are also imitation majolica and forged bronzes, to say nothing of the mock jewelry of the last century, much of which now comes into the market and attracts the ordinary tourist. These articles help to keep the curiosity shops open; but the finer works that still remain in the country are seldom seen among them, except perhaps with a few large dealers, who, possessing sufficient capital, can afford to wait for the wealthy collector. The good things come chiefly from remote palaces in Umbria, and are the private property of old families who are forced to sell them by reason of the compulsory division of property on the deaths of the heads of houses, or are tempted by hearing of the great increase in prices. Among such things was lately to be seen, for instance, a plaque or tile of Gubbio ware, the indubitable work of Maestro Giorgio, painted with a Madonna enthronworked into the pattern—the gift, no doubt, of some imperial benefactor. There was also plenty of rose and Venetian point, and the price is said to have been but two-and-twenty thousand francs.

ANTIQUE IVORY CARVINGS.

THE city of Volterra, in Italy, from time immemorial has owned several very remarkable ivories, some dating back to the fifth and sixth centuries, and others of the mediæval period. Lately, desiring to raise means for the improvement of their celebrated Museum of Etruscan Antiquities, the council decided to sell them, and had contracted with a French dealer for this purpose, when the Italian Government intervened and refused to authorize any private sale, but consented that they should be sold at public auction, after being duly advertised. It is to be regretted that the government itself felt unable to take them over for the National Museum at Florence, as the principal pieces are not only of great beauty, but of historical interest, and in a capital state of preservation. The expert, M. Tito Gagliardi, the well-known Florentine dealer sent by the government to appraise them, valued them at the moderate sum of 45,000 francs, but other experts assessed them at 65,000 francs. They were lately sold by auction in Florence for a total of 78,709 francs.

The pieces were fourteen in number, of which nine were comparatively unimportant, although interesting, consisting of small marriage-coffers of the fourteenth century, flasks and plaques of the same date, which fetched in all 1954 francs, much less than their real value, while the remaining five pieces brought 76,755 francs. The first piece was an oblong, narrow box, about sixteen inches in length, formed of plaques of sculptured ivory, representing classical subjects, warriors and chariots, with borders of beautiful decorative details, although, as a whole, representing the debased Roman art of the fifth and sixth centuries, to which period this box was said to belong. It was knocked down, after sharp competition, for 19,950 francs. The second article was a coffer of like form, with a flat top, composed, in a similar manner, of carved ivory slabs, with beautiful ornaments on a golden background, filled with warriors, animals, and fantastic inventions of, perhaps, a little later Roman period, but well preserved. This sold for 5950 francs. A small plaque, six inches long by about three wide, which, perhaps, was the half of a very early diptych of the time of Charlemagne, in the rude Lombard style, and was divided into three parts or pictures taken from the life of David, a remarkably fine representative ivory of the period, sold for 4830 francs. An ivory cross with its sculptured staff, painted and gilded, which belonged to the Abbey of St. Juste Alle Baize, a fine specimen of Italian art of the second half of the thirteenth century, sold for 19,740 francs.

This was sharply contested. But the greatest prize for the amateurs in ivory was the cross, with its magnificent staff, which belonged to Benci Aldobrandini, Bishop of Gubbio in 1331. It is preserved in a stamped leather case of the period, bearing the arms of the bishop interlaced with foliage and grotesque animals in perfect condition. The style of carving is rich Gothic, against a blue ground, with gilded ornamentation and arabesques in colors and inscriptions, the principal subject being the Adoration of the Magi. This splendid relic was sold for 26,250 francs.

ROCK CRYSTAL VASE WITH COVER AND HANDLES.
IN THE LATE HAMILTON COLLECTION.

ed, and saints on either side, delicately drawn, gorgeous in color, full of gold lustre and the precious and inimitable ruby red. It was certainly a beautiful object, and a few years ago might have been valued at as much as thirty or forty napoleons. The modern price is £800. This is not to be seen in a shop, nor is a plate by the same master, for which a thousand francs is asked. Attached to the hospital of Santa Maria Nuova is a museum which the directors of the charity are said to contemplate selling. It comprises fine works of art of various classes. Among the pictures is one which, if it is not purchased by the Italian Government, will excite keen competition. It is an immense altar triptych by Van der Goes. The centre is a Nativity as large as life. It is said to rival the famous Van Eyck at Ghent, and has its wings, whereas those of the Van Eyck are at Berlin, whither it is probable the Van der Goes will follow the Hamilton manuscripts unless the English Government steps in. The laces of the hospital have already gone to Paris. They comprised vestments of priests and an altar cloth of exceptional beauty, with crowned eagles

BARREL-SHAPED ROCK CRYSTAL VASE.
IN THE LATE HAMILTON COLLECTION.